'em upsQ: Which is better: `get("foo")` or `find_element_by_xpath("//input[@id='foo']")`? I have a website with a given Xpath. I want to use it as a quick solution. Which of the two is faster? #1: Using get html = browser.get("")

#2: Using find_element_by_xpath html2 = browser.find_element_by_xpath("//input[@id='f1']") A: TL;DR Get is always faster, but both have a high probability to fail and are not reliable Explanation get() and find_element_by_xpath() are similar, they use roughly the same technique to find an element, the difference is that get() uses get() method of the underlying WebDriver object to simulate a user clicking on the element.

find_element_by_xpath() uses get_attribute() method of the underlying WebDriver object to find the element, this is why it is faster than get() in most cases because of the difference in underlying implementation. Get The difference between get() and get() on simple string is pretty obvious. get() is a method which returns WebElement from a locator (in some cases, a WebElement locator, or an xpath locator). It acts almost like a keyboard macro. If there is nothing in the element, then get() will return an empty WebElement: browser.get("") # Prints:
