Everything about the technology was born out of a desire to take the game to the next level and deliver something new that would inject more excitement and unpredictability into the gameplay. The technology was fully developed for FIFA 20; the reason we decided to go ahead with its implementation for FIFA 22 is that by implementing it for the FIFA franchise once means it will be there forever. HyperMotion Technology Players today understand the power of moments in the game – be it a simple pass, or an exquisite, last-ditch tackle – that’s what keeps them turning the pages of their video game magazines in anticipation for the next installment of the game. That anticipation was never greater than the day the final whistle blew and the winner was announced. HyperMotion Technology is built around those moments that we all know so well; moments that players crave for, and for which they’ll be looking forward to see the next game as well. We feel that the authenticity of the moment is crucial for each and every aspect of the game, from the opponents’ movements to the result itself. So when we decided to upgrade the engine to introduce the new technology and provide a fresh level of intensity to the gameplay, we knew we had to build on one of the game’s biggest strengths, and that’s the quality of the physical experience. In-line with our desire to build the next best football game experience, we’ve employed motion capture technology, which has been used in the film and television industry for years, and uses high-tech suits, sensors and motion capture cameras to measure the movements of players. The data captured from the on-field movements and collisions is then used to not only improve the players’ experience in the game, but also to enhance their reaction, reflex and movement characteristics and help to craft the gameplay experience around the player, the ball and the opposition. During every game, the cameras capture all the aspects of the game. Some of the main ones are the following: - Movement in the air: How did he catch the ball? Where did he run into the player? When did he catch the ball? What did he do once he got the ball? When did he catch the ball? What did he do with the ball once he had caught it? - Movement on the ground: When did he tackle the player? What was his starting position? How did he move? How did he deal with
