Brazilian Curaçao Brazilian Curaçao is a traditional food, which is eaten by all the residents of the island of Curaçao. It is a salad made with beans, ground beef and vegetable, but with the following variations: the local ones have: vegetables, cheese, egg, ham, sausage, etc. Brazilians also customarily cook their Brazilian Curaçao with onions, tomatoes, corn, peppers, and toasted garlic cloves. This is a simple question but surprisingly I can not find the answer anywhere on the internet. What is the use case for using the __attribute__((__aligned__(__alignof__(struct type_name))));? I would like to know the purpose and the effect it has on the code? A: It's a different way to apply the attribute to a named entity. Most of the time you don't have to do this, as when you put the attribute on a local variable, it will take care of inlining the function as well. In this case it seems your aligned attribute is actually a syntactic sugar to make the main code harder to understand (quite frustrating, really). Q: How to push view onto window in windows forms? I would like to push a new view onto the current window (sort of like a form splitter) every time I click a button. What I'm trying to do is making a "quick view" version of a form. That is, when a user selects a certain type from a listbox, then the listbox is hidden and a new view with a new grid is put right over the top of the other form. The user can then "drag" the grid around and resize it as needed. I'm not sure if this can be done with 'WindowsFormsHost' but I've seen some examples. I know that if I could just push the grid onto a new view I'd be able to use the docking library - I'll deal with the horizontal/vertical docking separately.
