Humans were becoming more demanding, and the world was changing. No longer were humans content to bring their food home. They wanted to see their food to understand how it had been processed. Meat became less of a mystery and we began demanding better nutrition. The early hominid diet had been mostly tubers and roots; other than the occasional wild animal, what humans ate in those early days was processed or processed animal protein. By 2 million BC, humans began to improve their diet by supplementing animal protein with plant sources. Look for the raw food movement. There was a massive change from the old days where humans, especially children, ate raw food. Cooking destroys most of the benefits of plant-based food, and the one exception is that plant protein is much easier to digest than animal protein. There was a massive change from the old days where humans, especially children, ate raw food. We all know the problems caused by overcooking. The major problem was that the amino acids (the building blocks of protein) became denatured (coagulated), destroying the nutritional value. In order to get the protein into a form that was easier to digest, most people supplemented their diets with protein from animals. However, over the past 50 years, scientists have started to understand how what is once again a healthy and viable food source, plants can be eaten like animals without these downsides. Raw food is one of the most neglected and least used foods in today's marketplace. Despite the explosion in food choices, we are still seeing mass confusion with raw food. Today's diet is not consistent with the plants we used to eat, and we are more likely to be overweight than underweight. The evolution of plant-based diets. The most obvious way to get protein is to eat plant foods. Plants contain protein in their cell walls, similar to the protein in animals. All plants contain phytates, a form of phosphorus that binds to protein, so the protein gets less bioavailable when it is cooked. Nitrogen is the other major component of protein. Plants contain more nitrogen than animal proteins (seeds, nuts and beans), which provide the majority of plant proteins. The major benefit of protein from plants is that most of the protein is in the easily digestible form. All protein has amino acids, the basic building blocks.
